A modifier is an essential element that provides additional information about a subject in a sentence. Sometimes, these modifiers get lost or placed incorrectly, leading to confusion. This article will explore examples of misplaced and dangling modifiers, along with a helpful worksheet for extra practice. Misplaced modifiers are words or phrases that appear in the wrong place, modifying the wrong noun. For instance: "The salesman tried to sell a car to a customer that was broken down." In this case, the modifier "broken down" appears closest to the noun "customer," making it seem like the customer is broken down instead of the car. Similarly, dangling modifiers are words or phrases that modify a noun or verb that doesn't exist in the sentence. To correct such errors, one must add the missing subject: "Expecting rain, Nancy propped the umbrella against the wall." Here's a rewritten version of the text: This exercise was attended by everyone, featuring 10 questions to identify misplaced and dangling modifiers. A corrected version of these sentences is also included for practice. How did you do on the five practice questions? Check your answers below. 1. The original sentence had a dangling modifier, but this rewritten version keeps the meaning intact: Always eager for cake, everyone attended the birthday party. 2. Water from the sprinklers started to rust the child's brand-new bike, correcting the misplaced modifier in the original sentence. 3. Driving to the party, we heard the present rattling around in the trunk, instead of "the present" driving itself. 4. Forgetting that the microphone was on, the singer fought with his wife for the whole audience to hear, correcting the dangling modifier in the original sentence. 5. This puppy climbed into my lap, wagging her tail, which is grammatically correct and free from modifiers.
